

CEOs: Extra guards and added security measures help protect staff and clients

February 12, 2018 06:00 AM

Updated 7 hours 59 minutes ago

This week's question to South Florida CEOs who are on the Miami Herald CEO Roundtable: Incidents of violence over the past several years haven't been limited to public spaces. Has your company added or enhanced security measures recently in response to threats elsewhere? Why or why not?

===

"The AmericanAirlines Arena is the largest sporting and events venue in the city, so safety and security for our guests and employees are our number one priority. We spend more on security annually than on any other department within my arena division. It's that important to us. This includes routinely reviewing existing procedures and looking at new ways by which we can enhance them. In fact, in 2013, the arena won the National Center for Spectator Sports Safety and Security's Facility of Merit award for demonstrating an innovative approach to enhancing safety and security."

Kim Stone, general manager and EVP, AmericanAirlines Arena